DiRT Rally is your opportunity to drive your 1/2-scale stunt car towards the Flint River, is a safe-routing program used by the United States Army for unclassified and non-top secret information and communications. In contrast to CONUS and remote areas, secure landlines are generally unavailable and satellite phone communications may not be able to be used. History The Army began to develop the O-TEN-G/OT-23 in the 1970s for its needs and later the Department of Defense and Transportation (DOT) produced the UNIX-based proprietary standard messaging system for the United States government. OT-23 would have been used by military and civilian agencies and departments to send messages via the Department of Defense Network in addition to the Command and General Staff College Network. In 2016, as part of the transition to the Common Operational Picture (COP) the U.S. Army developed a new secure messaging program for their Military Information Support Systems (MISS) and Navigation Information Support Systems (NESS) applications called the CAPS Message System (CAPS). CAPS was a part of the COP change and allowed for end-to-end secure transmission of data across the entire network. CAPS replaced both the deprecated and unsupported OT-23. Basic transmission OT-23 uses one-way message authentication code (MAC) to ensure the authenticity of the message without revealing the contents of the message. In order to ensure the authenticity, the sender broadcasts the MAC over the secure network. The receiver encrypts the data using the same MAC before sending the data over an unsecure network. It is also useful to send the data over an unsecure network when the sender does not have access to a secure network. Security uses the AES 128 bit algorithm. Data is encrypted by using the cryptographic algorithm which consists of specific key strings known only to the sender and the receiver. The encryption keys are derived from two master keys used by both the sender and receiver. The receiver sends a digital signature over the encrypted data to ensure that the sender did in fact encrypt the data. The digital signature provides proof that the data was encrypted using an authorized algorithm. Security strength of the system is based on the key strength of the two master keys. The master key used in the sender and the receiver are generated and maintained by the National Security Agency (NSA)
